This book is about enlarging the way designers think about design, and to do that by learning more from the defining enterprise of the Modern revolution - the fast-moving advance of reliable sciences - applying their insights in practice. The scientific work that underlies new construction technologies - structures, materials, systems and software - has already revolutionized how we build today. But the insights emerging from the maturing sciences of human life - evolution, ecology, and the neurosciences - the ones that explore how you or I actually experience the places being built for us, are only now beginning to be embraced into design education and practice. The discoveries in the biological foundations of human experience and behavior are as revolutionary in their own way as the re-discoveries of arts and natural philosophy of ancient Greece and Rome by humanists of the European Renaissance. That was a time of dazzling creativity in the arts, sciences, and technology as Western culture became aware of new ways to think about nature and human nature. Now, in our cultural moment we have the opportunity again. That's why work being done in these fields by some very smart scientists, designers, and educators has been drawn together here for "a new look", and their findings and ideas have been organized into a structured perspective - a broad, updated science-based humanism that can be applied in day-to-day practice. And there there's an urgency to do this now. As we're trying to make a rational transition into emerging new paradigms, young, open-minded men and women committed to arresting the destruction of the planet and guided by an ethic of sustainability and affordability are working with disruptive new ideas and technologies, ones that are re-sculpting our malleable brain networks. The book's language is addressed to them.
