Twenty-something Samantha McCormick wakes up in the hospital to learn she has a spinal cord injury from a car accident, and she's paralyzed from the waist down. It doesn't take her long to begin to master the new physical challenges in her life. But she's haunted by the blurred lines between dreams and a fractured reality full of broken memories of the accident. Brian Haines is the physical therapist assigned to Sam to help her regain her independence and sense of self. He's devoted to his task, but his commitment to working with Sam eventually transitions from dedication to something more personal. Sam is thrilled and flattered by the attention. Yet, all the while she can't help but think she might be missing important memories and pieces of information, and she worries her new life is little more than a fragile house of cards. It's a long emotional journey towards recovery for Sam, full of unexpected moments, love, loss, and personal discovery as she struggles to find the version of herself she once knew.
