Not illustrated. 1881 Excerpt: ...was hewed for a house on the prairie, and hauled to its place with a hand sled. H. J. B. Miller, who was then trading thirty miles below, near the mouth of Coon Slough, came up with a load of provisions for the Indians, who were then encamped on Black River where Onalaska now stands. On his return, Myrick got his help a few days to put up the new residence and store, and moved in. In the spring of 1842, Myrick put his furs on the keel-boat used on his first venture up the river, and started for Prairie du Chien. On the way he overtook H. J. B. Miller, who was in a canoe. Taking him on board, they completed the journey together. Before returning, Myrick offered Miller half his claim and profits to become a partner, an offer with which Miller readily complied, and they returned together in a large canoe. In June, Miller went down to Rock River, and bought five yoke of oxen. In his absence, Myrick spaded a patch of ground for a garden, and on his return with the oxen, the boundaries of their claim were marked out, and a piece of ground plowed, which was planted with potatoes, on Blocks 6, 7 and 19 of the original plat. In the summer of 1842--43, Dr. Snow and Philip Jacobs came and went into trade. At the same time Myrick had some hewed pine lumber got out on Black River, and put up a comfortable dwelling of 20x30, finished on the inside with lath and plaster, and outside with siding, and having a shingle roof. To this was added an ell, 12x16, and a cistern. This was the first good improvement on the prairie. In June, 1843, Myrick returned to New York, where he bought a stock of goods, and in August was married to Miss Rebecca E. Ismon, of Essex County. He returned in September, bringing with him Miss Louisa Pierson, who passed the winter in his family, and the...
